

Our country is surely under attack when a group like Sinclair Broadcasting forces their local stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election. If this kind of story were coming out of another country, one struggling to find its way to democracy and stability, we might be able to ignore it, for a moment. But this dangerous action is happening right here in our backyard - and it's not the first time.

The FCC must do something now to stop corporate, un-American decisions from eating away at our democracy. An example should be made of companies that push the limits of their license either for financial or political gain.

If the decision to air the documentary cannot be stopped, Sinclair must be required to air an opposing viewpoint, in the exact same format, broadcast in a similar time slot.
